1) The tornado photograph and other photos taken after the destruction were taken by a non-photographic device. 2) The images were never taken in the French Alps and the images in question were not taken by satellite imagery. 3) The photo in question was taken at a location that is not in Europe—the site of the Irishman's death—and was taken around October 2011, at a time when the tornado had been just over the Alps, and when the photographer had not been there to be killed in the storm. 4) In the photo, the farmer whose photo was chosen to show the destruction looks like a farmer in Germany or Switzerland; the photos in which the farmer is wearing a "green scarf" are not from Europe. 5) Although the images are popular among anti-evolutionists, they are not authentic. Some climate scientists argue that satellite and other imaging equipment used to identify the locations of storms can be made more efficient. On May 1, 2017.. The images have become a popular target for anti-evolutionists, who say they are evidence of the Bible's claims that a powerful, intelligent entity caused the destruction of the earth's climate.
