Duchenne muscular dystrophy (DMD) is a fatal X-linked recessive disorder that is associated with mutations in the dystrophin gene that leads to progressive skeletal muscle degeneration and weakness. The clinical course is variable, ranging from non-ambulant patients to those with only mild skeletal muscle weakness who die during the third to fifth decade of life. To examine whether serum levels of individual amino acids are associated with disease severity in DMD patients we used LC-MS/MS analysis. We analyzed sera from 30 DMD patients and 18 healthy controls and found higher levels of lysine (2.4-fold; $P = 0.008$) and lysine/glutamate ratios (2.6-fold; $P = 0.017$) in sera of DMD patients. Furthermore, we also found higher levels of glutamate (1.8-fold; $P = 0.0004$) and glutamine (1.5-fold; $P = 0.0157$) in sera from DMD patients. The increased levels of lysine in the sera of DMD patients suggest that this amino acid may be involved in the pathogenesis of the disease. The increased level of lysine/glutamate ratios in patients might be a sign of continuous muscle damage, reflecting increased creatine supplementation in patients.
