This article started a flame war, what can I say? Either I'm that annoying dude who's too optimistic, or everyone has too much free time on their hands. However, regardless of what it is we can agree that it's a wonderful tool. Something that many of us don't even know how to do, and this is ironic, considering the amount of time we spend working with computers. I'm going to say one thing, that we need a better name. Windows Service Launcher was what was proposed in the first comment. That idea is actually very good, but many people here say that a name like that sounds, well, like a Windows Service Launcher. I can't disagree with that, but you need a name that sounds nice, or at least identifies what it is. If we're being honest with ourselves, the "Application" name might actually be misleading. What I'm trying to say is that the application isn't exactly that, it's more like a one-stop shop for all things related to the Task Manager. It doesn't matter how good the service name sounds, unless there's something tangible called "service" in English, then even the best of English speakers would probably fail to think of one, let alone how to actually call it. As I already said, I'm not going to agree with the name of the application, but that's also because I don't agree that the name is really important. It's true that it could look a bit like a Windows Service Launcher, but that can be "fixed", one way or another. The main thing is that we have a simple, streamlined GUI which doesn't require any additional software. The best part about that is that it doesn't have any "obnoxious" features, and doesn't take up more space than the Task Manager itself does. And the main thing that's important about this tool is that it's free. For that reason it's even more important, since money isn't ever an issue. We can give the application a name, but in the end that doesn't change anything, as we will see. How to include the desktop shortcut If you're using Windows 7, then you can follow these steps, although we'll be going through "An alternative way", since there's no need to add any registry entries, for those who want to do that. By Stephen Den Office 2016/Office 365 comes with a host of new features, one of which is the ability to access Microsoft Project on the web. Since its launch, this has been sorely lacking on the web, as only the client has been available for the iPhone/iPad, Windows Phone 8 and Windows 10 Mobile. The free client is also available for Mac OS X, as well as Android. Here is a quick look at how it works, and what it can do. Project Overview Project on the Web gives you a first look at what you can do with Project Online. You can manage projects, view tasks and assign other users to them. Realtime Chat A new feature in Office 2016/Office 365 is real-time chat. You can communicate with any user online, or ask them to send information to you. For example, you could send a question to a user and get an immediate reply. Add New Tasks After you begin work on a Project, you can work on other projects at the same time. You can also add tasks at any time to an existing Project. These are kept in an area called the Backlog. You can also create new Task areas. For example, you may create a new area for a different project. You can edit existing Tasks with any of the tools provided in Project Online. Other Features Here are some other new features you can discover on Project on the Web. Save to Microsoft Office document format In previous versions, you could only save a Project to an Office document format. This has been expanded so that you can save to: Access Excel XML MHTML For all of those that use Access to create Projects, you have the choice to save to: Access Base 64 XML Open XML for the Office Open XML format By default, Project saves in Access format. You can save in Base 64 format by clicking on the Save to Base 64 check box. Save a Project on your PC with a Single Link You can save a Project file to your local PC with a single link. This makes it easier to access a Project on your local computer. You can do this by right-clicking on the Project and clicking on "Copy Direct Link".
